By and large, lesbians remained either unidentified or a very closeted community. In recent times, an unusual outburst of lesbian expression took place in 1996 when right-wing groups protested the screening of the movie Fire. In response to the protests, lesbians collectivised into the group - Campaign for Lesbian Rights or CALERI, which drafted its manifesto titled Lesbian Emergence in July 1999. But all along, there have been lesbian undercurrents in the Women’s Movement, even if they have not featured as part of the main agenda of the movement. And although the relationship between the lesbian and Women’s Movement has not always been easy in India, lesbians have found comfort within its fold, given the common cause of combating male oppression.

The Rig Veda dated 1500 BC, refers to a pre-patriarchal period that propagated a system of thought focused on female sexuality. In this pre-Vedic period, pleasure was the preponderant principle on which sexuality was based; the progenitive principle was secondary. With the rise of Vedic Brahmanism, patriarchal social systems developed. Progenitive sexuality sexuality for procreation became important. Gradually, the pleasure principle was excised from female sexuality, which became subordinate to the purpose of procreation. Male dominance grew, as procreation became the basis of male-female relationships and gained social sanction to become the bedrock of the structure of society.

The Women’s Movement has not posed a serious challenge to this social construction. It has chosen instead, to focus on increased access to a greater range of services to count its gains. On the other hand, the LGBT movement puts the spotlight on the patriarchal social structure. It passes out the notions of biological sex and gender; it questions whether social structures must assume a ‘dominant’ and ‘submissive’ role; and focuses the debates squarely on immutable human rights. In its demands for marriage, adoption, and shared finances, it demands that society reconsider the basis of its primary social unit the family.

The movement has made its first challenge. The Delhi High Court judgement has taken notice of the existence of same sex loving populations and declared that their rights as citizens of India must be safeguarded on the basis of the Article 15 of the Constitution. As the Supreme Court debates the right of all persons to the notion of a family unlike we have known before, it is not only the LGBT community but society at large, that must hold its breadth. Can we make a family that will give equal space and respect to all those of the feminine gender?

Key references

Gender has dominated the discourse on development since the beginning of the modern era. Although used interchangeably with ‘sex’, the term ‘gender’ refers to a social and cultural construction of masculinity and femininity not to the state of being male or female in biological structure.

Nevertheless, in our country, gender has been taken to refer to issues pertaining to women. Policy makers and administrators have felt that women are vulnerable, and have attempted to redress this situation through laws that address visible issues such as widow burning in the colonial period; dowry deaths in the post-independence era; and the legislation of the political participation of women more recently. Only recently, there has been an attempt to expand the concept of gender to move beyond those born as biologically female. The country has been witness to a different gender movement - a movement of those of alternate sexualities.

The Women’s Movement in India

The roots of the Indian Women’s Movement go back to the nineteenth century, when male social reformers took up issues concerning women and started women’s organizations. Ever since James Mill wrote in his History of India (1817) that the condition of women in a society is an index of that society’s place in civilization, the ‘woman’s question’ not only came to dominate public discourse for more than a century, it also became the touchstone of the colonial-nationalist encounter. A handful of Indian men from the upper castes/classes of society were used to endorse the position, and thus emerged a social reform movement in which the new elite attempted to redress the worst features of the old patriarchal order.

The abolition of Sati in 1829 and the enabling of widow remarriage in 1856 was achieved through a series of campaigns. Apart from formally doing away with the practices, the social reform movement also helped to create the female counterpart of the new progressive Indian male - the Modern Woman. She took part in the burgeoning Freedom Movement as it became mass based and required greater participation. The two main issues that dominated the Women’s Movement in the years before Independence, were political rights and the reform of personal laws.

In post-independence India, the Women’s Movement was divided. The common enemy, foreign rule, no longer presented a common threat. Some women leaders had joined the Indian National Congress to hold positions of power as Ministers, Governors and Ambassadors. Free India’s Constitution gave universal adult franchise and by the mid-fifties India had fairly liberal laws concerning women. Most of the demands of the Women’s Movement had been met and there seemed to be few issues left to organize around. The problem was now one of implementation and for this to happen, there was no choice but to strike at the basis of the patriarchal social fabric. However, the centuries-old socialization of women posed a barrier and it was difficult to collectivize women on such issues.

In the meantime, women dissatisfied with the status quo joined struggles for the rural poor and industrial working class such as the Tebhaga movement in Bengal, the Telangana movement in
And women's militancy developed, gender-based issues were also raised. Women also became an integral part of national political parties with all the major political parties establishing their women's wings. In the seventies, women began to take an active role in local movements. The anti-price rise agitation launched in Bombay in 1973, mobilized women of the city against inflation. The Nav Nirman movement, originally a student's movement in Gujarat against soaring prices, black marketing and corruption was soon joined by thousands of middle class women. The Chipko movement began in the small hilly town of Gopeshwar in Chamoli when representatives from a sports factory came to cut trees, and with their united strength prevented the contractor from cutting trees.

Among these was a campaign in 1985, in support of the Supreme Court judgment in a divorce case. Shah Bano had petitioned the Court for maintenance from her husband under Section 125 of the Criminal Procedure Act and the Court granted her demand. The government however, yielded to the demands of orthodox Muslims who protested against interference with their personal law, and introduced the Muslim Women's (Protection of Rights in Divorce) Bill denying Muslim women redress under Section 125. Over the years it has become clear that despite progressive laws and an enlightened judiciary, there is little will to challenge the status quo and take action that responds to the felt needs of oppressed womanhood.

At about the same time, the United Nations took the lead to gather countries on a single platform to discuss issues related to women and undertake joint action to address their vulnerability. The first World Conference on the Status of Women was convened in Mexico City, 1975. Twenty years later, the Beijing Conference in 1995 reported that progress has been taken quite long in the West, for example universal adult suffrage or the right to vote.

In the post-independence period, although the women's question dominated the discourse on development, there was little effort made to question or challenge the position of the woman or the patriarchal structure. The eighties and nineties witnessed various campaigns protesting against issues like dowry, rape and sexual assault which raised the bar on society's accountability to the woman on the matter of her position and for the first time, challenged patriarchy as the basis for social structure. After the nineties, the Women's Movement has largely been subsumed under the rubric of development. Governments across the globe have taken cognizance of the need to address the vulnerability of women; and indicators identified and benchmarks defined to assess the development of women. However, none of the indicators challenges the core issue: the position of women.

The message is clear. Progressive rights are an ideal to aspire to and work towards, but the situation of women in the family - the core unit of the patriarchal structure - is passive and subservient. Womanhood continues to be obedient and self-sacrificing. With the man as decision maker, the wife, daughter, sister does as she is told. Social Movements can be defined as forms of collective action aimed at social reorganization. Does the Women's Movement in India qualify as a social movement by this definition? Did it lead to social reorganisation?

A closer look at history shows that the movement was not born out of the felt desires of Indian women. Women were encouraged to come out and join a freedom struggle in need of greater numbers. For the first time, a large number of women came out in public and participated in various campaigns such as the Civil Disobedience Movement, the Non-Cooperation Movement and the Quit India Movement. However, they soon returned to the oppressive family fold as India gained freedom from colonial shackles, and only a few belonging to the urban, educated upper and middle classes continued to remain active in the public sphere. Nevertheless, the Freedom Movement had brought with it some very progressive rights, the attainment of which had taken quite long in the West, for example universal adult suffrage or the right to vote.

The Sexual Minority Movement

The discourse on alternate sexualities in India's public space has grown in volume, and in recent times, those who practice same sex relations have become more visible. A sub-population of MSM (kothi and others) experience life as the feminine gender. They face discrimination in the family, in the eyes of the law and in society at large for not conforming to conventional heterosexual behaviour and/or norms of gender identity. The powerful Indian family idealizes the heterosexual basis of marriage, and basic concepts of what it means to be masculine or feminine grow out of rigid convention. Men have shaped the world's ideals on women's roles in love, sex and the family. And since men are completely absent in a lesbian relationship, it is disregarded as a valid expression of sexuality.

The modern Lesbian Gay Bisexual Transgender (LGBT) liberation movement took off with the May 1968 events in Paris, the Binnenhof protest in Holland and the Stone Wall riot in New York in June 1969. Arguably, the most influential of these was the riot in the Stone Wall bar, in which drag queens and gay patrons fought the police in what was otherwise a routine case of police harassment in gay space. The event was honoured a year later with the first of the modern 'Pride' parades, employing the basic strategy of asserting visibility.

The news and effect of the international sexual minority movement of the West found an answering call from India in the eighties. The visible face of the LGBT community was that of Ashok Row Kavi. In many ways, it was the 'coming out' of this single individual in 1986, that provided the spark that lit the proverbial bonfire. He acted as an important catalyst for the growth of groups. In 1990, India's first gay and lesbian Magazine, Bombay Dost, made its debut. However, it would be wrong to think that homosexuality was absent from the public eye before 1990. Indeed, homosexuality was discussed in one form or the other on a range of platforms. As early as 1941, Ismat Chughtai's short story Lihaf (The Quilt), explored a lesbian relationship. The early happenings within the movement in India were quite different from what had taken place in the West. In India, on one hand there was an attempt to develop an ideological discourse around the issue; the other was simple collectivization in the form of safe places or support groups like Red Rose in Delhi, the Counsel Club in Kolkata or Good As You in Bangalore. The ideological discourse led to the initiation of movement to demand rights by the LGBT community as equal citizens of the country. In 1994, the AIDS Bhedbhav Virodi Andolan submitted the petition for the repeal of Section 377 in the Delhi High Court which took the view that coitus between individuals of the same sex was 'against the laws of nature'. In 1999, the first Pride March was organized in Kolkata. The march also called the 'Friendship Walk' was held in Kolkata mainly to raise the visibility of the sexual minority. But since 2008, Prides are very much associated with the repeal of the infamous Section 377 of the Indian Penal Code. Coincidentally 10 years later, on the very date of the Friendship Walk, the Delhi High Court read down Section 377 and made consensual sex between same sex adults legal in India on 2nd July 2009.

The decade also witnessed the growth of community based organizations such as the Humsafar Trust. In the long term, such community based organizations proved to be the standard bearers for the community. Collectivization of the MSM took place largely through community based organizations which had become the new form and locus of activism. Doing everything from offering counselling and safe spaces to promoting safe and healthy sexual behaviour. It became clear over the first decade of the new millennium that a move had to be made toward a larger platform.

The formation of some organizations also contributed to the milestones to the movement in the nineties. For example, Sangama, an organization founded in 1999 focused on mobilizing sexual minorities to make them aware of their rights, then encouraging them to protest against discriminatory practices such as social exclusion, police harassment and blackmail by goons. Efforts also started to be made to air the concerns of Indian sexual minorities in international forums. Aditya Bondyopadhyay was the first gay individual to testify against the state supported oppression of sexual minorities before the UN Committee on Human Rights in Geneva in April 2002.
